Beginning the Journey: Uncertainty surrounds me as I grapple with diverse perspectives on emotions, mental health, and relationships. Especially within my own relationship, questions arise about the enduring nature of love over 4.5 years, and even beyond, spanning nearly 12 years friendship. Love, a subjective experience, varies in interpretation. While I acknowledge the existence of constant love, I also fear the potential repercussions it might bring in relationships and differing perspectives. The challenge lies not in a lack of belief in love, but in the apprehension of the consequences it may entail. Maintaining a steadfast mindset proves challenging, leading me to scrutinize and judge others. Amidst this internal conflict, Pradee stands out, challenging my preconceptions and prompting me to reconsider my own thoughts.

Out of the Box: Here, I aim to articulate my thoughts on a specific aspect of feelings—love. This isn't just love; it encompasses partnership, companionship, and the intricate connection between physical and mental presence. Reflecting on my past as a religious individual, I once held negative views towards the LGBTQ+ community. However, a desire to refrain from judgment led me to explore and understand their experiences. Although my respect for trans individuals remains unwavering, the rest of the LGBTQ+ spectrum leaves me in a state of confusion.

Can Love Transcend Beyond Traditional Norms?: Is love confined solely to conventional notions of relationships between men and women? What about individuals with specific gender identities, like those in the trans community? As humans, our complexity doesn't neatly fit into black or white categories, and our diplomatic nature often leads us into shades of gray, embracing both good and bad aspects. While we can't reach the extremes of divine goodness or malevolence, our inherent humanity lies in navigating the gray areas. In relationships, my strong belief is that if both partners share a resolute commitment, they can overcome any external challenges. However, this requires mutual focus and interest, and it's acceptable to part ways if such alignment is lacking.

The Dynamics of Relationship Perspectives: In relationships, individuals bring diverse thoughts and perspectives. Despite these differences, the essence lies in fostering thoughts that protect, support, and love each other. If this shared sentiment diminishes, the relationship faces jeopardy, emphasizing the crucial role of both individuals in sustaining the connection. The question that arises is: in the context of "love on each other's," whom on whom? Love between individuals who undergo gender transitions is acknowledged and accepted, reflecting both human nature and inclusive religious perspectives. Their capacity for love and physical intimacy is considered genuine and valid.

Divergence in Same-Sex Relationships: Questions arise when considering same-sex relationships, particularly between men and men, women and women. Despite societal advancements, understanding and acceptance of such relationships may vary. It's essential to distinguish between true love, genuine feelings, and the potential misconception of lust. The notion that LGBTQ relationships might end human reproduction is a common concern. However, it's crucial to recognize that individuals in such relationships can still contribute to society through various means, including adopting or other forms of family building. Expressing concern isn't rooted in shame or hatred but arises from a genuine desire for understanding and acceptance. Encouraging individuals to discern the difference between love and lust is a call for introspection and self-awareness.

The Ethical Dimensions of Relationships: People might question my deep interest in this topic, and truthfully, I don't have a clear answer. I find myself compelled to encourage others to reconsider their perspectives. Drawing inspiration from biblical verses emphasizing the balance between rights and benefits "we have rights to do anything, but not everything is beneficial", I reflect on the ethical implications of our choices, particularly in relationships. While we have the freedom to pursue anything, ethical considerations should guide our actions. Delving into the complexities of love, I challenge the notion that it's exclusive to heterosexual relationships. I ponder whether physical intimacy is rooted in genuine love or mere lust. Addressing queries about same-sex relationships, I highlight the need for understanding and break down societal preconceptions with a touch of humor. Engaging in relationships between two eggs (lesbians) or two sperm (gay) may not lead to conventional outcomes. Comparatively, some relationships involving both an egg and sperm (male and female) may encounter challenges, yet the attempt itself is commendable. In moments of desire or necessity, individuals, including myself as a person with a disability, possess the capacity to convince both ourselves and others. This extends to forming relationships, even with someone normal..... "try to be ethically beneficial in relationship"
